Surveys of consumers or their families and caregivers are an essential means of assessing quality in the delivery of home and community-based services (HCBS). A substantial number of such surveys have been fielded for the purpose either of measuring HCBS quality generally or of specific aspects of HCBS quality. Other surveys not developed for HCBS nevertheless measure concepts that are important in HCBS quality, such as life satisfaction or community participation. As the need for implementation of quality metrics in HCBS becomes ever more urgent, it is important to understand which quality-related concepts have been addressed in some form by existing surveys, and how well, and which concepts are generally lacking in relevant survey content.

With funding from the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, the National Quality Forum (NQF) recently convened a committee of stakeholders to identify and prioritize the domains of quality in HCBS. This ongoing work is expected to be completed by September 2016. A draft interim report was issued in July 2015, containing an initial set of 11 domains of HCBS quality as identified by the committee. Also included were a list of characteristics of a high-quality HCBS system ("characteristics"), which correspond closely to the domains; the characteristics have since been refined and a revised set is included in the second interim report, released in December 2015.

An initial set of proposed subdomains was also included in the first report; these are to be further refined during 2016. As noted in this report, some of the proposed subdomains appear in more than one domain, and in other instances very similar subdomains appear in multiple domains. This poses a problem for classification, but it is likely that the committee will clarify the domains and reduce some of this overlap before the final report is issued.

This report represents an attempt to classify questions in the more relevant consumer, family, and caregiver survey instruments that address the NQF HCBS quality domains. Both the corresponding characteristics and the proposed subdomains have been used to guide the process. Although the author attempted to be judicious in the selection and classification of items, it must be acknowledged that many decisions in this process are subjective and somewhat arbitrary, including which instruments to inspect, which items to include from each instrument, into which of multiple, semi-overlapping domains to classify each item, how to group items within each domain, and when to exclude similarly worded items because of overkill in a particular concept. In general, surveys and questions that could apply broadly, across disability type or age group, were given higher priority for inclusion than those that were more narrowly focused. When there are self-response and proxy-response versions of a question, the self-response version is shown.

Note that surveys developed for respondents other than consumers, families, and caregivers have not be included in the inventory. Surveys of providers and program administrators are beyond the scope of this report, as is use of administrative data or encounter data, such as that obtained from provider visits or claims submissions.

Although the main purpose of the report is to illustrate the extent to which surveys have been used to assess the different domains of HCBS quality, some survey developers may want to put together an instrument by selecting items from this inventory. Please proceed with caution. First, some of the instruments included here are under copyright, meaning that the developer’s permission might be required before items can legally be borrowed wholesale. This caution especially applies to developers of surveys for commercial use.

Second, a survey instrument is—or at least, ought to be—more than the sum of the questions it contains. It is important to make sure that the items are generally consistent with one another, in that they use the same terminology, for example, and do not constantly shift format, from a yes/no question to a true/false statement to agree/disagree. Furthermore, despite any assurance from the developer of the original survey that the instrument was thoroughly tested, there is no substitute for performing at least some rudimentary cognitive and simple validity testing (e.g., face and content validity) of any new use of items in a different context or on a different population.
NQF Domain: Choice and Control

Description: The level to which individuals who use HCBS are able to choose their services and control how those services are delivered.

Corresponding characteristic: Provides for a person-driven system that optimizes individual choice and control in the pursuit of self-identified goals and life preferences.

Proposed subdomains: Choice of program delivery models and provider(s) including self-direction, agency, particular worker(s), and setting(s); personal freedoms and dignity of risk; achieving individual goals and preferences (i.e., individuality, person-centered planning); self-direction; shared accountability
